We evaluated the quality of life in 26 patients with severe chronic obstructive pulmonary disease and in their spouses in comparison with a matched control group consisting of 20 patients with severe chronic obstructive pulmonary disease and their spouses. All patients were first diagnosed with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease within 2 years before inclusion. The four most important determinants of quality of life, assessed with standardized questionnaires, were physical function, respiratory function, dyspnea and social support. In the disease-specific quality of life questionnaire, patients with severe chronic obstructive pulmonary disease showed significantly worse physical functioning and dyspnea scores, but not more affective dyspnea or social support compared with patients' spouses. The spouses of patients with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease showed significantly more affective dyspnea and reduced physical and mental function compared with spouses of patients with coronary heart disease, but not more social support. More than half of the patients with severe chronic obstructive pulmonary disease and of their spouses reported some symptoms of depression.The mobile communication networks have widely deployed the handover technology between base station systems to realize the handover between base station systems. The handover is the process of transferring a user terminal between base stations when the user terminal changes its serving base station during the execution of a service such as voice
