Study on the use of crystalline aluminosilicates and zirconia-coated alumina for purifying organic compounds from wastewaters. We investigated the capacity of two different types of crystalline aluminosilicates (CAS) for purifying organic compounds from wastewater. The use of zirconia-coated alumina (ZCA) was also tested. Moreover, the influence of the adsorbent characteristics, including metal ions adsorption and surface acidity, on the removal of organic compounds from wastewater was examined. CAS adsorption was found to be much more effective than ZCA for removal of carbonaceous organic compounds from wastewater. This was attributable to the high surface area and larger pores of the crystalline aluminosilicate adsorbents compared to those of zirconia-coated alumina. The presence of trace metal ions in the wastewaters was found to inhibit the adsorption of organic compounds. A reasonable conclusion is that the adsorption of organic compounds from wastewater is an irreversible process which is strongly affected by the structure and chemical properties of the adsorbent surface. diaconus – deacon Deacon of the third order of the Minor Basilica of St. Peter, surnamed diaconus (in Latin; see: deacon and minor basilica) was a late medieval title in the Latin Church. The title was used as a rank only, usually of the highest rank. This rank was normally reserved for senior (stewards) who were delegated by the pope to oversee the ceremonies of the office of the basilica, such as the monthly divine offices. The deacon who exercised this function, however, was not the deacon as a full member of the priesthood, but the deacon only as a member of the minor basilica, i.e. he was the overseer, but not the deacon. The title was originally restricted to the curial and collegiate churches, but it soon came to be adopted by the churches of the Benedictines, the Carmelites, the Dominicans and the Franciscans. The title of Deacon of the minor basilica was created as a substitute for the old office of de f3e1b3768c
