"The FDA has taken a long time to get to any kind of definitive answer on the subject and even longer to answer these critical questions." With about 80% of the states now accepting medical marijuana, drug policy experts are working to establish what the impact will be. A study at the University of Alabama found that cannabis use is more common in states with medical marijuana programs. "There is not a lot of data yet, but there is a lot of anecdotal evidence that suggests that the states that have legalized medical marijuana are actually seeing an increase in the use of marijuana among medical users,” says Dr. Rochelle Newman. Newman is the director of the University of Alabama’s Drug Education and Research Center and the author of "Rethinking marijuana: A new approach to marijuana policy" and also the medical director of a marijuana dispensary. “There are a lot of reasons why this might be true and there are probably many more reasons why it might not be true,” says Newman. “The simple reason is that you’re not going to
