An electrophoretic display device (e.g., electrophoretic display panel) has the characteristics such that an electric field is applied to a dispersion of charged particles in a dispersion medium and the charged particles move in accordance with the electric field to display an image by changing the light-and-darkness of display portions. In order to cause the charged particles in the dispersion medium to move, an electric field is applied to the dispersion medium. A typical method for forming an electric field includes use of a pair of electrodes formed on a substrate. There is also an image display device (e.g., electrophoretic display panel) provided with an electrophoretic display unit having an elect 2d92ce491b
