In a sample of 633 primary school children in Singapore, East Asian children showed significantly higher social-behavioral development scores than African and Caucasian children, although a significant effect of cultural background was found only for the subtest of self-discipline. For both verbal and visual-spatial ability, East Asian children scored significantly higher than African children but not significantly different from Caucasian children. Moreover, cultural background had no significant effect on either verbal or visual-spatial ability. East Asian children scored significantly higher than African and Caucasian children on the teacher-rated ratings of social-behavioral development and Chinese cultural attitudes.Q: How to make a scroll bar appear when i hover over a tab in top navigation I need to make a scroll bar appears when i hover over a tab in top navigation.
