THE FISTS OF THE NORTH STAR ON BLU-RAYThe effect of anti-cancer drugs on placental drug transfer: a review of the literature. The fate of drugs administered to patients and their unborn fetuses is of great clinical and theoretical importance. Many anti-cancer drugs are either mutagenic in the dam or have been shown to cause fetal toxicity in animal models. The effect of anti-cancer drugs on placental transfer may affect drug exposure in both dam and offspring. However, data on the effect of anti-cancer drugs on placental transfer are limited. The aim of this paper is to review the available information on the effect of anti-cancer drugs on placental drug transfer. Only those drugs which have been tested in both animal and human studies were considered. All studies reporting levels in the fetal circulation were included in the review. L-Asparaginase and 5-fluorouracil appear to increase the transfer of doxorubicin to the fetal circulation in animal studies. L-Asparaginase and 5-fluorouracil also have been reported to increase the transfer of procarbazine to the maternal circulation and may have the same effect on the transfer of cyclophosphamide and methotrexate.
