News Kamis, 28 February 2011 Subway Data Collection Makes It Easy for Consumers EUGENE, Ore. – Subway restaurants are one of the fastest-growing segments of the U.S. restaurant industry and are thriving on the back of an increase in customer demand for quality and convenience. According to a new Subway study commissioned by Restaurants.com, more than half of those surveyed would choose a Subway restaurant over a traditional fast food restaurant, and when looking for a fast food option, Subway is the most popular fast food chain. Subway is utilizing unique omni-channel technology to assist in guiding customers to their local Subway restaurant, and helping Subway merchants serve their customers better by gathering customer information about their customer preferences in-store and on-line. Using the SubwayData program, Subway restaurants can help provide their customers with location-specific restaurant information, encouraging consumers to visit their local Subway restaurant. SubwayData’s application collects key customer and market information on Subway’s Web site and mobile applications, allowing customers to view Subway locations nearest them and get information on the variety of Subway sandwiches, subs and salads and which Subway restaurants offer vegetarian and vegan options. This information can help customers make the best choice for fast, fresh sandwiches and salads. This information helps Subway to make better menu and advertising decisions and to help customers find the best Subway restaurant for them and their needs. Subway also uses information collected to drive traffic to Subway restaurants, with the hope of adding additional revenue streams to the Subway brand and helping drive customer loyalty. “Every year we survey consumers to get their feedback about their experiences at Subway restaurants,” said Robbie Sharp, Vice President of Customer Experience for Subway. “What we found this year was that consumers are more and more demanding, and we are focused on providing the best service to ensure that Subway is recognized as the customer choice.” “We’re very pleased with the results of this year’s Subway Consumer Satisfaction Survey, which shows that Subway has become one of the most well-loved fast-
