Introduction {#sec1_1} ===== As more and more pharmaceuticals are being developed, the number of drugs is increasing exponentially. Examples include antipsychotics, antidepressants, and hypnotics, which tend to increase the risk of falls. Among these, antipsychotics are the only type that can induce extrapyramidal symptoms in the elderly, especially Parkinson's syndrome, which may lead to falls. In Japan, the number of patients taking antipsychotics has increased to 1.9 million and the average dose has reached 5.7 mg/day. \[@B1] There have been several reports about the use of antipsychotics for the treatment of neuropsychiatric symptoms in advanced dementia, especially agitation, but there are few reports about the use of antipsychotics for the treatment of apathy in dementia. \[@B2] Apathy tends to occur in the advanced stages of dementia and is associated with poor prognosis. It is a multidimensional phenomenon comprising a personality, mood, and behavioral factor. Chronic apathy in elderly people may result in depression and lead to poor social skills. Cholinergic drugs and [d][smallcaps]-cycloserine, which stimulates glutamatergic systems, are known to be efficacious in alleviating apathy. \[@B3] Cholinesterase inhibitors, including acetylcholinesterase inhibitors, are also expected to be effective, although they have not been used for apathy in dementia. Herein we report a case of acute psychosis and apathy in a patient with advanced dementia as a result of taking antipsychotics for the treatment of aggression. Case Report {#sec1_2} ===== An 83-year-old woman was admitted to a clinic with complaints of lower back pain and confusion. The patient had a history of hypertension, osteoarthritis, angina pectoris, asthma, and hyperlipidemia. Her family had lost sight of her one month earlier; her son was living far away. Her medication history included treatment for hypertension, osteoarthritis, hyperlipidemia, and asthma. No notable medical history was elicited on physical examination. Her vital signs at admission were as follows: blood pressure, 155/100 mm Hg; heart rate, 85/min; respiratory rate, 20/min; oxygen saturation, 98% on room air; and
