If it can be done, what's the protocol that's used? How would you, from chrome-extension, pass this information to server, then have it stored? I've seen it done with a file upload form from the extension, but I'm not sure the POST includes the file or not (is there any way to test that I can send a file, without having to deal with those issues?). A: If it can be done, what's the protocol that's used? A generic HTTP post: The content of the form (including any file) is sent to the server as the request body. The browser (Chrome) is configured to handle multipart mime messages (the file is in a multipart form section), so no magic is involved. How would you, from chrome-extension, pass this information to server, then have it stored? You need to put the information somewhere that the server can access it. A common use case is to pass it in an auth cookie that is already in the browser. On the server side, the file name is passed along as a POST header. The content must be Base64 encoded for the server to access it. You can use the Content-Disposition header to indicate the MIME type of the response body (using multipart/form-data). The server then needs to base64 decode the request body (as well as the auth cookie) to see what it received. --- title: "Enable or disable a feature" ms.reviewer: ms.author: v-lanac author: lanachin manager: serdars ms.date: 3/27/
