There are literally billions of web pages on the Internet. One has to wonder how a simple web page is put together. With billions of web pages, how can Google know where to go when you search for something? In reality, Google (and most other search engines) aren't paying attention to each and every web page. They simply index the web pages that are created for the search engine to find, which can be the same format as the web pages you read in a magazine, newspaper, or book. Google also indexes each word, number, and character that you search for, so that search results can provide you with different search results than the web world and how it got to its present state. Few things are simple or clear cut, though the study says that the standard Marxist explanation for the late 19th century is more accurate than the standard liberal account, which says that capitalism grew naturally. But it doesn't really answer the fundamental questions. Why did capitalism grow? Why did it happen in the way it did? Why was it pursued and endorsed as a whole by governments and societies? We should also note that the authors themselves are, to put it in a common phrase, a right-wing economic sect. They hold that some kind of high-rolling conspiracy in which interests dominate governments and corporations was necessary to get to the present moment. The left has been leading the world into a catastrophic, hyper-centralised system with far-reaching negative consequences. The right has been trying to restore the good order of the 19th century by getting rid of the left. If you're tired of all the Russian BS, I recommend you read this. "The Russian Revolution has inspired much of world culture, but it didn't happen in a vacuum. This book explains how it happened and why it happened to the extent that we can reconstruct it." "If you're tired of all the Russian BS, I recommend you read this." I do have friends who read that, too, and then they say, "This is a silly book." It's not silly. It does actually make a lot of sense. Another should be, why did France and Germany repeatedly snub their collective noses at the Brest Peace Treaty signed by the Bolsheviks in December 1918? What really happened in 1923 to cause a realignment that left Germany still militarily alive, but the Soviet Union and the German Army instead destroyed each other in the General Staff Purge of 1934? Why did the German military continue to oppose the merger of the two successor states with the Soviet Union, and why did Germany come to a bitter end with the defeat of the Nazis in 1945? Why did the West and Russia continue a Cold War that destroyed Western economies and killed countless millions of people in the 20th century? And why did it end in 1990? It's the most important question of all, but it hasn't been answered. The best way to answer it is by going to the primary sources, and Professor Hannikainen goes right to
