I have an SQL Server database which has a performance problem. I created an index on a table. Looking at the execution plan, it shows the creation of the index as part of the insert time of a related tables. Does it mean that using this index will add a little overhead to the inserts of the related table even if this is not part of the INSERT? A: In short, yes. It is likely that the fact that the main table will use the new index to fill in the gap in its already sparse records is "worth" the search time for the new index. A: The only overhead on INSERTs caused by an indexed column is the time taken to look up the value in the index, not the INSERT itself. So yes, it should be a marginal addition, but not a burden. Q: Convert currency from string to double I have a string "3,000.00". I have tried converting it to Double but it prints an error. System.out.println("R.valueOf("+str.toString()+")"); I am using Java SE. A: You can use NumberFormat and NumberFormat.getNumberInstance(). Example: String str = "3,000.00"; Double d = NumberFormat.getNumberInstance().parse(str).doubleValue(); The membrane surface area and volume of eukaryotic cells are regulated during cell-cycle progression to accommodate a changing surface area-volume ratio in relation to the time of cell division. This process is termed "cytokinesis". Cell division proceeds through two distinct steps: (1) septum formation, (2) membrane abscission. During cytokinesis, cells divide by means of a specialized cytoplasmic structure termed a "contractile ring" comprising a number of microtubules, actin
