surface of the adsorption medium which decreases gas flow, produces malodorous products and/or renders the adsorbent ineffective for separation. this problem occurs because the separation processes are carried out in fixed beds of granulated adsorbent material. these adsorbent beds eventually become fouled by the desired adsorbed constituent or by the undesired adsorbed constituents. to prevent these deposits, the walls of the column are periodically cleansed by temporarily closing off the column, moving the adsorbent bed to the walls of the column, and agitating the adsorbent to dislodge any deposits from the walls. the adsorbent then is returned to the adsorption bed. during these "cleaning cycles", the pressure of the gas stream is typically reduced, for example, to atmospheric pressure, for a period of approximately one week to two weeks.
